Not illustrated. 1828 Excerpt: ...than endanger the bill: and the other, that the duty was not recommended by the Harrisburg Convention. In this latter point, he was then corrected by his colleague, who read a resolution of the Convention, recommending the duty. As to the new argument that the high rate of duties would not enhance the prices of commodities, he would ask, why then does not the gentleman vote for the duty on molasses? By his own theory, the people of NewEngland could suffer no injury by it. If the gentleman is as unfortunate in all his facts, as in that in relation to cotton, they cannot be much depended upon. He says, that the manufacturers now consume one-third of the cotton produced in the country. This was an error. Mr. H. could prove to the gentleman, and would do it at a proper time, that not more than one-fifth was so consumed. Mr. MARKS said that the gentleman could not have forgotten that he remarked, yesterday, in giving his reasons for opposing the duty on molasses, that he doubted the capacity of the manufacturers to supply the consumption of the country. It was, therefore, a different case from a manufactory which, with encouragement, might take the place of the foreign article. Mr. FOOT replied briefly to some remarks of Mr. HmMii, to which Mr. BRANCH rejoined. Mr. FOOT said a few words, and alluded to some remarks made yesterday by Mr. Rowu. Mr. ROWAN rose to reply. After a few remarks, he said, that, to come back to the woollens, he would ask what was the origin of the Harrisburg Convention? and who created the excitement? It was known that the sole object of that convention was not manufactures. It was, although people did not like to speak out, got up for political purposes. He would ask how many Jackson men were in that convention? It was true that the p...
