

Pacific Review, Vol. 2 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Pacific Review, Vol. 2 As a matter of fact, we do have a right to intervene in Mexico, according to the views of a majority of eminent publicists. The rule of non-intervention is anomalous and totally impossible in practice. Intervention is equally as necessary for the preservation of order between states as for the maintenance of peace between individuals. Absolute liberty is just as impossible with the state as with the individual; and the necessary abridgements of this liberty mean interference in the domestic concerns of a state, just as in those of an individual. It is not possible under the existing international system to dispense with intervention, and the dispute of publicists in this respect is purely an academic one. The real dispute is not whether, but how far, intervention should be made permissible. Perhaps the most representative summary of permissible interventions, whether from the viewpoint of varying opinions or that of advancing public opinion, is that found in Hersheys textbook, The Essentials of Public International Law. Armed interventions, he says, are permissible under three heads, in varying degrees: humanity, legality, and policy or self-interest. The first of these justified the intervention of the Powers in Bulgaria, or that of the United States in Cuba. The second includes the right of self-preservation, which is really above law; the maintenance of treaty rights, which may be justified as support of the law; interference to end an illegal intervention, as in the case of Maximilian in Mexico; and finally a far more doubtful matter, to protect nationals or their interests abroad.
